Arrowheads, objects fixed to the end of a shaft and shot with a bow, are only a fairly small subset of what archaeologists call projectile points. A projectile point is a broad category of triangularly pointed tools made of stone, shell, metal, or glass and used throughout prehistory and the world over to hunt game and practice warfare.

My understanding is that the stone was used to rub the hide to make/keep the hide supple/clean. I've heard this from NAs who I asked about it. I've seen similar from the east on the web. Stones are very well polished from rubbing the smoother hides as compared to manos that show course wear form grinding use.
